HERE IS WHAT I AM

To be a Rotarian is rather an attitude, obviously a positive attitude. It is an attitude to serve without expectation. In one sense, it's a motivation too as we have to motivate ourselves to accomplish a task to the society. If we pledge bound to serve the society we have to develop and nourish this attitude consciously and continuously within us. We have to seek out the encouraging factor from our inside not from the outside.

As a few people from the society, it seems, feel it important to do the good deeds for the community. In real life, everyone is busy enough to satisfy their own needs and struggle to attain their own goal. But a Rotarian's consciousness is quite different. He always feels the urge within himself to serve.

And this is important. This kind of feeling is sensibly more vital than a mere commitment. Commitment is rather unintentional, and more related to obligation, while a true feeling for the society is spontaneous, and therefore, renders the impression of an attachment. This attachment is essential. If we feel attached to the downtrodden, we feel an impulse to act for them.

This implies we will be more succeeding in making out things when we have felt this true and spontaneous impulse within ourselves to do that. This spontaneous urge, no doubt, goes beyond any commitment. And we were talking about this attitude in the very beginning. A Rotarian, we feel, now has the time to develop this attitude within them.

If we can bring the smile on the gloomy face of a vulnerable one, we bag a success. And if we bag a success we smile too by the end of the day.

Quite reciprocal, isn't it?
